★ ABSTRACT

Agriculture has remained one of the key sectors of the ASEAN countries in spite of the evident success of the manufacturing sector during the last decades. Investment and trade liberalization facilitated further the development and expansion of the export crop sector while destroying the viability and sustainability of smallholder farming. While geography and geo-economics in ASEAN countries determine to a large extent the agrarian character of their societies, most of the policies of ASEAN country members generally do not sufficiently protect their farmers. They have rapidly liberalized their agriculture sector through their commitments to the WTO and regional and bilateral FTAs which are very detrimental to the life of farmers.

These remain to be the huge challenges that men and women small farmers and landless peasants in ASEAN region need to confront, together with the rest of the peoples in the region, towards transforming ASEAN into a just community of nations.
